One special case of the Energy Conservation Act is the Mechanical Energy Conservation Act:
When there is no friction in the system, the mechanical energy of the body is permanent.

In a system insulated according to the law of conservation of mechanical energy, in which only conservative forces act between the bodies, the total mechanical energy of the system is unchanged. For example, when the body falls freely outside the Earth's gravity, the potential energy becomes kinetic, but their sum remains unchanged.
